Can you feed cats and dogs a vegan diet?

Some vegan pet owners don't just want to give up animal products themselves – they want their pets to do the same. But can cats and dogs really go meat free?

5 In June 2016, a Tumblr blog-user posted a picture of the vegan dinner she was about to serve her Labrador dog. The post went viral, with many people saying that it was wrong to not to give a dog meat. Under intense pressure, the vegan blogger eventually abandoned her social media account.

10 According to recent research, veganism has risen 600% in the US alone between 2014 and 2017. The idea of feeding our companion animals something other than meat has accompanied this trend. The carbon footprint from pet food is considerable. In 2017 it was estimated that the meat consumed by domestic animals was responsible for emitting the equivalent of around 64 million tonnes of carbon dioxide into the air every year – the equivalent of driving 13 million cars for a year.

15 As our pet population grows, that footprint is likely to get bigger. In 2017, the scientific journal Plos One published a paper which estimated that cats and dogs in the US ate the calorific equivalent of the diet of 63 million Americans.

This has led some to debate about whether our cats and dogs might be able to give up meat, or even go completely vegan?

20 However, the question is not that simple. "In the UK, under the Animal Welfare Act the owner has the obligation to feed the animal an appropriate diet," says Daniella Dos Santos, the president of the British Veterinary Association (BVA). "If your personal belief system means you don't want to eat any animal protein, that's fine, but often that diet is not designed to meet the welfare standards of your pet.

25 "Cats are obligate carnivores, and to be healthy they require certain amounts of amino acids. If they don't get them in their diet, it can lead to health problems," says Dos Santos. "For that reason, you wouldn't advise a vegetarian diet, let alone a vegan one."

That hasn't stopped some companies from creating vegan cat food. One such company is Ami, based in Italy, which sells vegan cat food that has been fortified with the protein taurine and other essential amino acids. But the general consensus from all but a handful of vets is that cats are unlikely to thrive on a diet without meat. But what about dogs?

30 "It is theoretically possible to feed a dog a vegetarian diet, but it's much easier to get it wrong than to get it right," Dos Santos says. "You would have to do it under the supervision of a veterinary-trained nutritionist."
